"The chemical method," said Mr. Broadwell, "will probably never meet with success from an economical standpoint, owing to the fact that aluminium We shall open March 1st the has never been found free in nature. The chemical method takes advantage of chemical affinities, and substances found in an elemental state necessarily have weak affinities. The electrical current furnishes us with a medium whereby this metal can be extracted from its ores at any point desired, as well as with any rapidity. The advantage we claim lies chiefly in two points: First, we claim to be able to make one pound of commercially pure aluminium with the expenditure of but one electrical borse power. Previous to this improvement twenty-two electrical horse power has been necessary to accomplish the same purpose. Secondly, we are able to take clay of ordinary fair quality and remove from it, efficiently and eheaply, all iron silicon. "Of the two above improvements it appears that the mode of application of the electric current has gone the furthermost toward the chearening of this process since 1885, and have tried exunder my observation. It is a metal that can replace copper in almost every instance, and if it can be produced for thirty-five cents a pound it will be cheaper than copper at ten cents a pound, because it is three and a half times lighter, and consequently there is three and a half times more in bulk."

Designing silks is something that emartistic talent in France. A pattern that that is just speeding away from him. takes means fortune to the mill that will appreciate the effort of the observmakes it. Each house has its own pat- ing newsdealer to make life less botherfruit of their labors. A pattern cannot be protected by letters patent. A large buyer may, though, secure from the maker exclusive control of the sorts he buys. It behooves him to buy carefully, prayerfully. The verdict of a petty jury is not more uncertain than that of the silk wearing public.

Shrewd advertising, good display, may do something toward influencing it, but the pattern that toward the close of the season is voluminously in stock is at once hown down in price and cast upon the bargain counter. Often the placard, "Reduced from one dollar," sells the stuff at nearly the original price; some-times, though, the world laughs such lines to scorn.—Chicago Tribune.

Good Deer Bunting in Maine This Year. Deer are now plentier in our settle- given. ments than they have been for a long time at this season of the year. Deer can't be any otherwise than plenty this coming season, as I can't remember when there ever was as many deer in Maine as there will be this coming season, although in some particular localities deer are not as plenty as they have been some other years. This is due to being too much hunted and leaving deer in the woods to die after being wounded. In the Nicatous region both game and fish are particularly plenty this year.— Cor. Portland (Me.)
